

Entering a Cold Store

One March day in 2015, the respected Comrade Kim Jong Un visited a newly-built fishmeal factory.

While making the rounds of the factory, he stopped in front of a building and asked if it was a cold store, and said he would see it.

The accompanying officials felt embarrassed and sorry to have him enter the cold store stinking of fish.

But Kim Jong Un repeatedly asked them to enter and see how many fishes were in the cold store.

An official had no other choice but to open its door, and told him that there was little worth seeing.

With a happy smile on his face, Kim Jong Un said those who were averse to “sea fragrance” should not follow him, and entered the cold store.

The store reeked of fish, but he said earnestly: I feel refreshed to have a smell of fish in a long time at the fishmeal factory. I am very pleased today. If it would be possible to provide our people with plenty of fish, I would like such a smell of fish all day long.

And he felt reluctant to leave the cold store.